Background

Education today has been emphasizing much on collecting knowledge, little on building understanding. It makes education become less contextual to students' life, and, accordingly less meaningful. In other words, students are lacking useful knowledge and skills they need in their life, both as individuals and as members of society. Developing meaningful education is a response to that situation. Meaningful education is built upon two big concepts: critical pedagogy and participatory education. Critical pedagogy is an educational process that is emancipatory, to free education from oppressive human-made structures both in knowledge production and in educational practices. It aims at building critical awareness and sensitivity toward injustice. Meanwhile, participatory education is an educational process where students are actively engaged in producing knowledge and solving actual daily problems. Within these two conceptual frameworks, an education process can be meaningful only if it is historical. It means that education today and for the future is dialectically linked to the national history. Also education must be developed dynamically and dialectically in correspondence with the social and cultural conditions of a nation. By developing meaningful education, we expect better future for children and more equitable and righteous society.
